THE COURT: The statutory factors that are the most prominent are common in this sort of case. They are taking consideration of the nature and circumstances of the offense and the offense conduct, providing a just punishment for that conduct, deterring the defendant at hand, but more broadly others who would be tempted to follow a similar course of behavior, promoting respect among the public for the laws of the land to know that they're being faithfully executed.

Mr. Gillis was not just a run-of-the-mill member of this conspiracy. He was one of the devisers of the scheme, from what I gather from the history. One of the guideline adjustments was for a manager or organizer. So I cannot find either the government's or the defendant's recommendations as adequate.

I sentenced a man in the conspiracy a week or so ago. His sentence was lower than the guideline range too, but not nearly 75 percent. It was more in the range of 50 percent. He was also a manager and organizer. So there's some — it's difficult to compare. Everybody has their individual personal circumstances and individual behaviors, but I find the suggestion of a 47-month sentence, as I say, inadequate. That isn't to say that I think the guidelines are the proper place.

So I've thought about this considerably, both on its merits and on adjustment to others in the conspiracy, and I think a sentence of 72 months is an appropriate sentence in this case, taking all into account, including what has been proffered in the papers.
